I'm 57 and was married in June. I have two grown daughters, 27 and 25, and was pregnant when I was 48 but it was ectopic. It was a real heartbreaker. I have not had a period in about a year and so I have not used any bc since I was married in June. In August my breasts became very tender and I was extremely nauseous, had to go to the bathroom every half hr, so I took an hpt even though I knew it was impossible for me to be preg but it was negative so I tried to dismiss it. The symptoms continued and I went to a gyn and she said I could not be pregnant and if I was I would not ever be able to carry to term and ordered a blood test to check for menopause. The test came back normal whatever that means, and I was so upset that I convinced myself that I was imagining the symptoms. I eventually two months later tried another hpt and it was positive, first response, and 3 more were also positive. I decided though to wait until I felt movement and then I would go to a doctor. I would now be 20 weeks from the day I felt nausea and I am sure I feel something moving in there. I have a big bulge that is getting harder to hide, and feel movement off and on all day. Still have tender breasts a dark line on tummy and nausea occasionally. Tired most of the time. Still work full time and worried. So I will probably go for a private sonogram after Christmas. Doctors make me feel foolish. Not sure what to do!

A warm welcome to Shelaughed! My husband and I actually joked about starting a board called "SheReallyLaughed" once when I thought I might be pregnant (in my 50's!), but I wasn't and we didn't. :)

I am praying for you! Please do keep us updated! What an amazing thought --but still, that's not as old as Sarah was when she had Isaac. :d

Praying for you to have good health and the peace of the Lord and His blessings!
